Rome. Aqueduct of Claudius. Rome enjoys a plentiful supply of water, as her numerous fountains prove, and from the earliest times great pains and cost were incurred to secure it. The famous aqueduct, of which the view shows the ruins, was constructed by the Emperor Claudius (A.D. 52). It was 42 miles in length and brought water from the neighbourhood of Subiaco. The gateway, Porta Maggiore, was an archway of this aqueduct.
